“Quality Is No Accident”

A Working Parent’s Playbook

FROM DEPOSITIONS TO PARENT-TEACHER CONFERENCES

Back in the day, I was what they used to call a “latchkey kid.” You know, the kids who were practically independent before they even made it to high school. That’s why I had to shine a light on National Working Parents Day, celebrated on Sept. 16. It’s a day that brings back memories of my childhood, filled with hardworking parents who juggled multiple jobs to make ends meet and ensure I had a wonderful upbringing. It also reminds me of my own journey as a working parent, balancing a busy law firm with family life.

Growing up, both my mom and stepdad were the epitome of dedication. My mom, in particular, was always on the move — she held down a full-time job and taught jazzercise (remember jazzercise?) a few times a week. It was a passion she pursued for nearly 30 years! She would even give dance lessons to kids in our community in whatever spare time she had left. This often meant long hours in after-school care for me, rides on the bus, or walks home. During my freshman year of high school, after basketball practice, I would walk to Taco Bell and wait for an hour until my parents could pick me up. Despite what you might think, I honestly wouldn’t change a thing. All of this taught me independence and resilience.

Despite their hectic schedules, my parents never failed to support me — they attended my games and were always there when I needed them, sometimes with a bit of help from friends and other parents. Their effort to make it all work showed me the true meaning of commitment and family support.

Now, as an attorney with my own children, I treasure the flexibility possible with self-employment, but it comes with its challenges. Unlike a traditional job, I don’t just have one boss — I have many, each a client needing attention and care. But this flexibility allows me to attend my daughter’s volleyball games even though it often means answering emails during timeouts or stepping out to take a call. It’s a balancing act I can only do with the help of my incredible team and today’s technology, which allows me to stay connected no matter where I am.

Of course, being well-organized is the true lifesaver for balancing work and family. My calendar is my lifeline — it keeps me where I need to be, whether that’s a court date or a school event. Any working parent can also attest that forgetting things is very easy. That’s why I’m always making lists. Whenever something comes to mind, I write it down immediately to ensure nothing slips through the cracks.

For all the working parents out there, finding that balance between work and family life is vital. It’s all too easy to fall into the trap of work addiction, thinking everything needs your immediate attention. But remember, most things can wait at least 30 minutes. Ultimately, you want your kids to feel you’re there for them no matter what. Explain to your kids why you might have to take a call during their game. They will understand — as long as you communicate openly and show you’re trying to be there for them as much as possible.

I have a 16-year-old daughter and a 12-year-old son, and I know these moments with them aren’t going to last forever. Every day reminds me to count my blessings and make the most of our time together. Here’s to all the working parents doing their best — it’s not always easy, but it’s always worth it.

These Financial Tips Still Work!

LIFE LESSONS FROM THE GREAT DEPRESSION

Breadlines, tent cities, people struggling to find work — the Great Depression was a national struggle. Reflecting on this historic time offers invaluable lessons on survival, community building, and resilience. What can we learn from such a tumultuous period? Let's explore four enduring life lessons from this era.

Be Flexible

Adaptability is critical to surviving tough times. If and when those situations arise, learning to live within our means is crucial, which requires a lot of flexibility. During the Great Depression, people knew odd jobs were better than no job at all, and these days, several apps like Uber, Instacart, and more help people earn enough to make ends meet. If all else fails, be open to moving to a cheaper area, like some families chose to do during the 1930s.

Get in the Kitchen

The cost of dining out continues to rise, meaning cooking at home is an easy and fun way to save money and connect with your family. Even if you lack culinary skills, you can find many inexpensive and satisfying Depression-era recipes online or in your grandmother's recipe box. Not everyone enjoys cooking, but knowing your way around a kitchen will dramatically decrease your monthly food bill.

Don't Replace — Repair!

What do you usually do when an appliance breaks down? Do you call someone to repair it or just get a new one? Both options are costly, and neither were feasible during the Great Depression. What did they do back then? They fixed it themselves — a practice that's even easier in modern times thanks to the internet. YouTube is an excellent resource for DIY tutorials for various products, and you can often find step-by-step instructions for specific models!

Watch Those Pennies

A famous quote during the Great Depression is still relevant even after more than eight decades. It goes, "If you watch your pennies, the dollars will take care of themselves." In other words, spare change adds up. Whether you're putting away 20 bucks or 20 cents, it'll add up to big savings in time.

During the Great Depression, people came together to support their communities, knowing there was strength in numbers, especially regarding survival. Despite being so far in the past, you can leverage the wisdom of the era to climb toward a brighter financial future tomorrow.

LAWS GONE WILD!

AMERICA'S MOST BIZARRE LEGAL RELICS

Thanks to our country's perpetually in flux judicial system, countless laws are still on the books that echo times long gone. They're outdated and absurd, often leaving citizens wondering, "What necessitated that rule?" Let's look at some bizarre laws from across the U.S. (even if no one enforces them!)

If you're in Wyoming, avoid tattooing any horses.

This law was made to stop people from making horses unrecognizable to their owners. Apparently, that was a big enough issue back in the day that it needed to be codified.

Don't tie your giraffe to a telephone pole or streetlamp in Georgia.

Isn't it embarrassing when there's nowhere to tie up the family giraffe on a quick errand? Wait, what? Don't tie that long-necked beauty to the wrong anchor point in Atlanta. It's believed this rule was enacted to prevent animal abuse, but it is unclear why lawmakers got so specific.

Get married in Texas by publicly announcing yourselves as husband and wife three times.

Make it legal with three public announcements, even if only one spouse is present for the proclamation. The requirement states that both parties must be willing participants, over 18, and unrelated.

All cats in New Jersey must wear three bells to alert birds of their whereabouts.

Outdoor cats are notoriously dangerous to the local wildlife populations, and Cresskill, New Jersey, decided they needed a law to protect feathery friends from their greatest foes. We're not sure the cats are on board with this rule.

If you're caught flirting in New York, you could pay a $25 fine.

In the early 1900s, flirting was such an issue that cities held an annual Anti-Flirt Week. This law aimed to help women feel safer on the streets by diminishing catcalling from passing motorists. Reportedly, a second offense would require the offender to wear horse blinders in public!

While these laws may seem silly, no one enforces them anymore — even though they're still on the books. Instead of holding any weight, they offer a glimpse into the concerns of our forefathers. The next time you encounter a strange law in your town, take a moment to ponder the history; you never know what you might learn about the place you call home.

Skip the Baby Shower — Throw a Nesting Party!

This Viral Trend Spotlights a Mom's Needs

Baby showers are entertaining, but nesting parties are fun and functional! This viral trend has been all over social media for good reason! Essentially, you invite over friends and work together to tackle tasks for the baby's arrival. If this sounds like a good idea, here are four tips to keep your nesting party productive and enjoyable.

Make a list of tasks and gather supplies beforehand.

Does the nursery need to be painted or decorated? Does furniture need to be assembled? Do you have equipment that needs to be installed or tested? What about sanitizing bottles, washing and folding baby clothes or linens, and organizing the baby's room? Figure out the priority tasks, then collect all the necessary supplies to complete the jobs at the party.

Carefully select your guest list.

Who is the most helpful amongst your inner circle? If you have friends notorious for hiding when a chore comes up, they probably wouldn't be a good guest for your nesting party. But don't invite too many people! As the saying goes, "Too many cooks in the kitchen spoil the soup."

Delegate jobs based on individual strengths.

As guests arrive, dole out tasks based on their strengths. Is your cousin great at organizing? Put them in charge of the baby's room. Is your bestie an excellent cook? Have them work on meal prepping some freezer options for those post-partum days when you need to fuel your recovery but don't have the energy to feed yourself. Is your brother a gym rat? Assign him to rearrange furniture and other tasks requiring muscle. Aligning the tasks with everyone's preferences or skills keeps frustrations to a minimum so you can enjoy this time with your loved ones.

Keep it simple.

Order takeout from a favorite local spot, provide beverages, and use disposable options for tableware. Remember, while fun is sure to be a byproduct of spending time with loved ones, the goal is to be productive, so the more manageable the party is to clean up and take down, the better.

'Survivor's' Erik Huffman Arrested for Domestic Violence

GETTING VOTED OFF THE ISLAND?

This 'Survivor' Couple's Marriage Might Be on the Rocks!

Reality star Erik Huffman was arrested for domestic violence charges following an alleged public altercation with his wife, Jaime Dugan, another alum of "Survivor." The couple met while filming the show in 2007 and have been together since — however, new information hints at trouble in paradise for the pair.

According to police reports, authorities responded to reports of a disturbance at a local convenience store in Spartanburg, South Carolina, this past January. They found Huffman, who told officers he was looking for his wife, claiming she had left him in the parking lot after the pair argued. Huffman seemed to imply that his wife might be thinking of harming herself, telling authorities that he wanted to make sure she was safe and medically okay.

When police caught up with Dugan and got her side of the story, the plot thickened. According to the police report, she'd discovered while on the way to the store that her husband had a secret second phone, which led to a fight where Huffman broke one of Dugan's fingernails and left a series of minor scratches on her hands. This incident made her feel unsafe, so she left him and drove away. Officers decided Huffman was the aggressor in the situation and arrested him on domestic violence charges; however, the case was closed the following day.

Married since April 2009, the pair has a child and found common ground in shared values, having both grown up in the South. "We were automatically connected because we grew up in the same town," said Dugan in 2020. "We felt at peace with each other." While neither one of them won their season of "Survivor," Huffman ultimately finished in sixth place.

This latest news leaves fans of the show and the couple in limbo as they wait to see how their relationship progresses. Will they be able to repair their marriage? And why does Huffman have a secret phone his wife doesn't know about? Time will tell whether their union survives.
